Iran Contemplates the Bill for Gulf War

Foreign reserves, strained by military purchases, have fallen as far as authorities feel is safe despite efforts to keep oil exports at profitable levels, diplomatic sources said.

As a result, the imported goods that helped keep iranians comfortable through nearly seven years of warfare have become scarcer and risen sharply in price, hitting hard at living standards of the poor families most attached to the revolutionary Islamic government.

His countermanding the Council

SEOUL -Tens of thousands of workers struck about 400 companies on Wednesday, a day after the government's first intervention in labor unrest that has crippled vital export industries, news reports

At the same time, the national police director ordered security forces to crack down on the violent demonstrations that have broken out in connection with the labor

"Police forces will be used to stop promptly any violent protests taking place outside work places, and all those involved will be arrested," the director, Kwon Bok Kyung, said in a statement.

Mr. Kwon said the police would also step up efforts to identify "outside forces" he said were trying to instigate labor disputes. The police have accused anti-government groups of encouraging labor strife for political purposes.

Following the order, police officers fired tear gas to disperse about 500 students demonstrating in support of striking taxi drivers in the provincial city of Tacjon, about 85 miles (137 kilometers) south of Seoul. About 20 students were reported to have been arrested in the 10-minute clash.

On Tuesday the deputy labor minister, Han Jin Hee, ended two days of violent protests against six subsidiaries of Hyundai, the nation's largest conglomerate, by promising workers raises and other benefits.

The workers said they would be back on the job Thursday.

Mr. Han told 20,000 striking Hyundai workers at a stadium outside the southern industrial city of Ulsan that the government would do its best to obtain the benefits by Sept. 1. Such a promise from South Korea's authoritarian government is a virtual guarantee.

Although Mr. Han said that the workers' demands would be mer, he did not specify whether that promise included the freeing of labor unions from government control or interference, which is among the strikers' main objectives.

Hyundai's founder, Chung Ju Yung, and his son, Chung Mong Joon, the president of Hyundai Heavy Industries, met in Seoul with labor union leaders Wednesday and agreed to recognize a new labor alliance that embraces half of the 12 Hyundai companies in Ul-

In return, union officials promised to exclude "outside elements" - students or others who have tried to politicize workers.

At the end of the meeting, the Chungs, father and son, joined hands with the labor union officials and held their arms above their heads in a show of victory.

Although the agreement Wednesday applies specifically to Hyundai Heavy Industries, one of the group's companies, both executives and workers said that it should also speed settlements at other Hyundai companies.

The latest convoy was the third to enter the Gulf under U.S. protection. Its timing was a surprise because attention had been focused on four reliagged tankers that have been loaded and are waiting off Kuwait for a U.S. Navy escort back through the Strait of Hormus.

Alcoholics Can Blame Their Genes, New Research Indicates

By Jane E. Brody

New York Times Service
NEW YORK — Alcoholism runs in families, fact recognized since ancient times. Although familial alcoholism has long been attributed to an inherited "weak character," until recently most researchers thought it was almost entirely the result of environmental influences: imitation of parental drinking habits, poverty and other social and family pressures.

However, studies conducted in the last 15 years, including a 1972 study of 69 hospitalized alcoholics in St. Louis, Missouri, and their siblings and ongoing studies of twins and adopted children in andinavia, have shed important new light on alcoholism's genetics.

The findings indicate that for at least half the 10 million alcoholics in the United States, hereditary factors overwhelmingly determined their development of the disease. Researchers have identified as important influences such inherited characteristics

as how an individual metabolizes alcohol, hormonal and behavioral effects of alcohol and tolerance of high levels of alcohol in the blood. On average, as Swedish studies of adopted children showed, the children of alcoholics are four abuse alcohol.

Rather than implying that some people are doomed to alcoholism, the findings suggest new ways to identify those at risk and to help prevent them from becoming alcoholics.

Just as people who have inherited a predisposition for developing coronary heart disease can take precautions, those at risk of developing alcoholism can learn to recognize potential problems and modify their drinking behavior accordingly.

First and foremost, the children - and grandchildren -of alcoholics must be aware of the risk to their health. In a recent U.S. survey, 16,6 percent of the respondents said that one or both of their parents were alcoholics, but only 5 percent knew that the children of alcoholics faced an increased risk of developing the disease.

Yer, the findings suggested, lack of awareness can increase the chances of alcoholism developing.

In other words, simply knowing about the risk helped the grown children of alcoholics to control their own drinking better.

Even if you are not the child of an alcoholic but are a blood relative of one, the risk is formidable. At an alcoholism conference early this year, Dr. Theodore Reich of the Alcohol Research Center at Washington University in St. Louis described his study, conducted from 1978 to 1983, of 243 alcoholics and their families.

Among the 202 men, 38 percent had alcoholic fathers and 21 percent had alcoholic mothers, 57 percent had alcoholic brothers and 15 percent had alcoholic sisters, 32 percent had alcoholic sons and 19 percent had alcoholic daughters.

Of the 41 women, the rates of alcoholism among their parents, siblings and children were similar, Familial alcoholism tends to develop early in life, Dr. Reich found. By age 25, 32 percent of the sons of the alcoholic fathers in the study had become alcoholics; of the sons of alcoholic moth-

At this rate, Dr. Reich projected, by age 40, more than half of the men and women with one alcoholic parent will have developed the disease; among those with two alcoholic parents, 60 to 65 percent will be likely to have it. By contrast, for individuals in the general population, alcoholism will eventually develop in about 3 percent of the women and 8 to 10 percent of the

Sri Lanka Security Men Questioned on Attempt To Murder Jayawardene

By Steven R. Weisman New York Times Service

COLOMBO. Sri Lanka - Investigators in Sri Lanka sought clues Wednesday to determine whether an apparent attempt to murder President Junius R. Jayawardene on Tuesday had been made with the cooperation of security guards or employees inside the Parliament

Photos Link Military to Aquino Death stan have not surrendered more than a small part of their weapons, and Mr. Jayawardene has haited the release of Tamil prisoners.

MANILA - A special court received new photographic evidence Wednesday supporting assertions that Benigno S. Aquino Jr. was murdered in 1983 by the Philippine military rather than by a lone assassin linked to communists. The evidence contradicted testimony at the murder trial, which began in April, of 40 soldiers and officials. It also contradicted testimeny at a similar 1985 trial of 26 persons, conducted under the administration of President Ferdinand E. Marcos. The point in question is the tra-jectory of the builtet that killed Mr. Aquino, who was a major political opponent of Mr. Marcos. His widow is President Corazon C.

The prosecution is seeking to Glass, U.S. Officials Review Abduction GULF: prove that Mr. Aquino was shot by one of his military escorts while descending an amplane staurcase Lawyers for the 40 soldiers and officials argue that he was shot on the airport tarmac by Rolando Galman, a gunman said to have had communist affiliations. Mr. Galman was killed by the escorts moments later.

Alexander Loinaz, a photographer, submitted to the three-judge court 39 photographs he took during an autopay just hours after Mr. Aquino was shot.

One photograph shows an un-identified officer of the National Bureau of Investigation holding Mr. Aquino's head, with a probe reaching through from an entry wound in the back of the head to the chin.

There was previous testimony that pathologists had been unable to get a probe through the wound during the autopsy.
Chief Prosecutor Raul Gonzalez told the court that the photograph showed the trajectory of the bullet to have been downward.

This contradicted previous testimony that the bullet, fired from a 357 Magnum revolver, traveled on a more or less level trajectory from the back of his head, hit a hard ear bone and splintered into several fragments, two of which came out through the chin.

The two sides agree that Mr. Aquino was shot from behind. n December 1985 a court upheld the Galman theory and acquitted 25 soldiers, including Mr. Marcos's armed forces chief. Genaral Fabian C. Ver, and a businessman in the killing.

Most of the anti-accord agitation has been by members of the nation's Sinhalese majority.

Tamil guerrillas have been waging an insurgency for an indepen-dent nation in Northern and Eastern Sri Lanka since 1983, and 6,000 persons have died in the warfare.

When signed last month with Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi of India, the accord spread anger among groups organized to protect the interests of the Sinhalese, who are Buddhists.

These groups also vehemently objected to the introduction of 6,000 Indian troops as "peacekeep-ing forces" in Tamil-dominated areas where the guerrillas have been surrendering their weapons. Many Sinhalese see the Indian presence as less an agent to disarm the Tamils than an invasion force bent on establishing Hindu dominance in the island

Government officials are known to be concerned by the possibility of disaffection within the Sri Lankan armed forces and police who bear the responsibility of containing violence.

In the wilting August heat, shuggish throngs of tourists shuffle along the quay gaping at the monster yachts; others meander idly through stores with names like Sweatshirterie on a waterfront that resembles a vast T-shirt outlet.

"No road crosses St.-Tropez," wrote the novelist Colette five decades ago, in a more patrician era. "Only one takes you there and it doesn't go far. If you want to leave. you have to retrace your footsteps. But would you like to leave?" This summer, a reasonable man

finding himself here might scream
"Yes!" to Colette's enery For St " to Colette's query. For St.-Tropez, which once played a central role in the French imagination, has been overwhelmed and engulfed by tourism, by what some disdainfully call "the democratization of the beaches."

campsites. To keep St.-Tropez from sinking rretrievably, Dr. Jean-Michel Couve, a chain-smoking cardiologist and the village's mayor, is trying to broaden its tourist season beyond the hot months, upgrade its clientele and give it a larger role, notably as a business meeting place. A convention center is

"We got more and more people with little spending power who just wanted to see Brigitte Bardot and Roger Vadim," said Dr. Couve. Which meant that the people with real spending power left or holed up in their villas. I would rather have one tourist who spends 1,000 francs than 1,000 tourists who spend one franc."

Except for American students on their first trip to Europe, no one stares, for example, at the bare breasts on Tahiti and Pamplona beaches. A democracy of nakedness prevails.

ISTRES, France — President François Mitterrand said Wednesday that France was prepared to use its forces in northern Chad, an area formerly considered off limits during Ched's struggle to push back Libyan occupiers.

But he said that Paris was not prepared to act as a "gendarme" in former central African colony. Mr. Mitterrand, speaking at a French air base at Istres, just north of Marseille, was apparently seek-ing to clarify France's position afbased in the southern half of the country to provide air cover for his army, which was coming under sustained Libyan bombing. Mr. Mitterrand quickly refused, saying that the two countries should settle the sovereignty of the Aozou Strip by international arbitration. Later in the week, bowever, De-

A Homemade Sanction

The largest strike ever in South Africa is ments. The companies — such as the Angloin its second week, and tension is building. Talks had opened between the black National Union of Mineworkers and the white-run coal and gold companies to discuss ways to reduce violence that has accompanied the strike. But on Tuesday the NUM broke off the talks at word that police were firing at strikers. It seems that several hundred thousand workers are out and that major parts of an industry that provides most of South Africa's foreign exchange earnings are shut down. Unions are the principal organized bodies permitted to blacks under apartheid - a reflection less of white enlightenment than of a wish to secure an orderly workplace. Still, it takes immense skill and courage to organize a work stoppage on any scale, even in the highly unionized mining sector. The unions lack resources and cannot provide strike pay; hardship facilitates recruitment of strikebreakers; the companies have greatly pre-ferred access to police and courts. In this strike, the miners, who earn a fifth of what white miners make, are asking for increases in the 30 percent range, plus other improve-

American Corporation, internationally known as an outpost of South African progressivism - offer a smaller percentage increase. In addition, supervisory jobs are to be opened to black miners.

The items in contention in this strike are economic, but the strike goes to the essentially political question of how blacks will fight white oppression. This is why whites were reluctant to permit workers a body for collective self-expression in the first place. Now that the miners' strike is under way it is becoming a major test of power in a country in which other forms of black assertion are rigidly proscribed.

For several years, foreigners have been preoccupied by the issue of applying economic sanctions to South Africa to force internal change. It is often asked whether foreigners should be taking steps whose heaviest costs are borne by others - by blacks in South Africa. In this strike it is blacks who are applying a sanction by withholding their labor and who, bravely, are themselves bearing the great costs.

The Moment of Truth

The war in Nicaragua has reached the moment of truth. The new Central American peace initiative forces Sandinist leaders and President Reagan to choose between the prospect of more fighting and the risks of peace. There is every hardheaded reason for Mr. Reagan to choose the diplomatic path toward peace.

This is perhaps his last chance to seek a settlement and the benefit it can bring. Unless he makes a sincere effort to bargain, be may wind up a double loser: getting no money from Congress for the contras and no concessions from the Sandinists. If, however. he enters into serious talks, he could wrest real gains for the democratic opposition within Nicaragua. Finally, by supporting the Central American plan, he could strengthen elected governments in the region.

So far, all Mr. Reagan has accomplished is to antagonize his own supporters on the right flank, who fear selling out the contra rebels, without winning friends in Congress. He first gave half-hearted backing to a peace plan fashioned by House Speaker Jim Wright, and then a still more equivocal blessing to the initiative endorsed by the five Central American presidents.

Why, after years of resisting negotiation, did Mr. Reagan finally come around? Skeptics think it was because he knows that, without at least a gesture toward negotiation, the administration cannot persuade Congress to approve new military aid to the contras when the current appropriation expires Sept. 30. That suspicion is unmistakably underscored by the abrupt resignation of Philip Habib, the president's Central America negotiator.

If Mr. Reagan's diplomatic initiative is only a gesture or a feint, he could wind up without funds for the contras and without any gains in bargaining with the Sandinists. But if the administration presses negotiations, real progress is possible. Among the concessions Mr. Reagan could seek are guarantees for press, religious and other freedoms in Nicaragua, a climate in which divergent views could survive.

Negotiating would also allow Mr. Reagan to advance a cherished objective: strengthering the security of democratic regimes in El Salvador, Honduras, Guatemala and Costa Rica. The elected presidents of all four countries dislike and distrust the Sandinists. But all have made plain their interest in an end to both the contra war and the frenzied arguments over U.S. intervention. Indeed, the position of El Salvador's president, José Napoleón Duarte, would be reinforced by signing an agreement with President Damel Ortega Saavedra of Nicaragua, in that it would legitimize both governments.

There is evidence the Sandinists themselves are divided on the peace plan. Mr. Ortega went to Fidel Castro for support on it. Mr. Ortega reportedly is opposed by Interior Minister Tomás Borge Martinez, whose police last Sunday beat up demonstrators and jailed human rights monitors. A clever negotiating strategy could exploit these divisions and help the Sandinist progratists.

If Mr. Reagan does not follow the negotiating path, there is only one explanation: Rather than take his own risks for peace, he prefers to pass the mess on to his successor. - THE NEW YORK TIMES.

And Sow It With Salt

"Hitler, for the first time since he came to power, did not speak or make a public works at Essen. He kept referring to Mr.

Hambro as 'that Jew, Mr. Hamburger.' That was the atmosphere in the Germany that Mr. Hess and his colleagues had created, and that was the way they used to talk about people who got in their way. (Mr. Hambro was a Norwegian political leader who op-posed the Nazi takeover of his country.) Earlier in his career, Mr. Hess had put his signature to the Nuremberg Laws, which stripped Jews of their rights as citizens and helped pave the way for their extermination.

That act in itself would seem to make rather trivial the controversy in the last decades of Rudolf Hess's life over whether he should continue to be imprisoned. He was, from 1967 until his death Monday at the age of 93, the lone inmate of Spandau' Prison in West Berlin, where the four powers occupying Germany locked up a number of prominent war criminals.

He had been in one prison or another since 1941, the year he made a bizarre, unauthoappearance," William Shirer wrote in an rized flight to Britain apparently to try to entry in his "Berlin Diary" for May Day make peace between Germany and that 1940. "His deputy, Rudolf Hess, spoke in country. At his trial after the war, he was his place — from the Krupp munition unrepentant about his service to Hitler. The only defense that could be made of him was that he was mad or simpleminded, but the evidence on both counts was ambiguous. The Soviet Union, which had wanted him hanged, refused all efforts by the Western powers to let him go. It is perhaps a good sign that the efforts of Mr. Hess's family to free him could strike in many people a feeling of sympathy for them as human beings: that was something Rudolf Hess and his followers tried to deny their victims.

Mr. Hess made several attempts at suicide. On Tuesday a prison guard found him with an electrical cord around his neck; the autopsy should determine whether that was the cause of death. With its last inmate gone, Spandau Prison will be razed. It is seen by some neo-Nazis as a shrine, which should be justification not just for razing it but for sowing the ground with salt.

The Soviets Are Next Door

Whether the Americans with their show of force can really do anything to maintain the shipping lanes open is doubtful. If Iran should attack a U.S. ship, the Americans would find it difficult to employ sufficient force against Iran to seriously weaken the Islamic Revolution, if for no other reason than that the Soviet Union is right next door and would hardly allow it. With each explosion of a mine in the Gulf, the price of oil goes up. So does the bill to the American taxpayer. We are in the Gulf because we are hostage to political pressures. We are paying more at the pump because of that and we will be canceling important social programs in the future to pay the bill for frigates, aircraft carriers and fighter planes being pressed into escort duty for private companies most of which are not American.

- Howard Kleinberg in The Miami News Left to Rot to Death in Berlin

The death of Rudolf Hess (removes) one of the very few relies of Berlin's status as a fourpower city. The Russians still have their war memorial to guard in the British sector, their place on the air traffic commission and their right to drive around West Berlin in military vehicles, just as the Western allies drive around East Berlin regardless of East Germany's appropriation of the Soviet sector as its capital. Insofar as Hess's death ends both a personal indignity and a dispute between east and West, it may be seen as a positive development. But there is also room for shame that a man who ceased decades ago to be a threat to anyone except himself was left to rot for 46 years because they could not come to terms about him while he lived.

South Korea Is Paying for Its Anti-Labor Policies

N EW YORK — The labor protests sweeping South Korea, including the occupation this week of Hyundai factories by 20,000 workers, are the result of years of denial of labor rights. It is time

Seoul began to guarantee these basic standards. Emboldened by President Chun Doo Hwan's political concessions last month, workers in every economic sector have begun to demand labor rights. Yet for years, the Chun government has actively collaborated in repressing workers. Laws effectively limit union formation, prevent strikes and localize conflicts. Enterprises that have a "serious impact on the national economy" are exempted from constitutional guarantees of the rights to organize and bargain collectively.

The average work week, 50 hours, is longer than that in any other country, according to the International Labor Organization. In the garment industries, it is often 90 hours. Weekly wages, ranging from $30 to $80, are the lowest in 20 industrial countries surveyed in February by the U.S. Labor Department. Workers suffer the highest accident rate of any industrial country. Few unions have been allowed to form, and any that are not affiliated with the government-backed Federation of Korean Trade Unions have been dissolved. Government-supported thugs have sent hundreds of workers to hospitals. Labor demonstrators, often convicted in one-minute tri-als, comprise about half of all political prisoners. Many of them are beaten, given electric shocks or tortured with pepper water. Although the security forces have shown uncharacteristic restraint during recent strikes, no laws have been changed, and the apparatus of repression stands ready.

Despite promises of reform from President Chun and Roh Tae Woo, the ruling party's candidate to succeed him, democratic advocates continue to be sent to jail. The government has also shown bad faith by planning increases in its riot police force and failing to release all political prisoners. Presi-dent Chun proposed this week that labor disputes be By Felice D. Gaer settled without government intervention. That is not sufficient. Left unchecked, management will continue to send thugs to abuse demonstrators and will illegally fire and blacklist organizers.

South Korea's workers need protection. The government should change its laws to permit unions to form and join national federations. It should also establish minimum wage and hour standards and safe working conditions. Other countries could encourage Seoul to proceed with its long-promised application to join the Interna-tional Labor Organization. The United States should remind Seoul that our laws stipulate that our trading partners comply with internationally recognized labor rights. Toward that end, the U.S. Trade Representative should revoke South Korea's trade privileges but continue to keep its labor practices under review.

President Chun has raised hopes for democratic changes, including protection of labor and human rights. When Americans, and others, consider buying South Korean goods, they should keep in mind the conditions under which they are produced.

Some Still Compete by Exploiting Children

RAPPED by locked doors and barred windows, 19 persons died in a fire that swept a small factory in a Bangkok suburb one night last year. The victims, part of a work force of 30 producing leather goods, had bedded down for the night on three floors of their factory. Their normal work day was from 8 A.M. to 11 P.M. On that night they had worked till 1 A.M.

In the teeming metropolitan areas of Third World cities, it is not uncommon for men, women and children to work long hours. Nor is it unusual for workers to spend 24 hours a day in a factory or a factory compound. The workers who died in the Bangkok fire, many of them rural migrants, did not earn enough to pay for housing. Wages were be-tween $20 and $80 a month, with the lower pay going to 13- and 14-year-olds. Huge Southeast Asian textile and electronic industries thrive on the exploitation of unmarried young women.

A Brookings Institution economist recently prescribed that the American steel industry out wages in half to meet foreign competition. Why stop there? If the bighest priority in international commerce were to beat the competition, the United States should also consider putting a large number of high-school-age children to work full-time; abolishing rules and practices that save lives and limbs on the job; giving manufacturers greater leeway to pollute the environment at work and in the community.

There is a better choice. Rather than adjust the U.S. standard of living to that of nations with lower standards, America can help them raise their stan-dards. Most people would abstain from buying a foreign-made short or blouse if they knew it was stained with the sweat of exploited children. But most consumers are uninformed. In any case, the whole burden of making moral choices in the huge international marketplace should not be left to consumers. That principle was recognized as early as 1890, when the U.S. Congress banned the import of goods made by convict labor.

The varied crops, the closed bio-logic loop of Sichnan farms made me think: Do these remote villages have something to tell troubled farm communities in the United States?

Only 50 or so years ago, U.S. farms were far smaller and self-sufficient. Farmers kept all sorts of animals, raised a variety of crops, took fuel and lumber from their own land, spun their own wool. Today, the perils of "monoculture" — the dependence on one crop, on pesticides, fertilizers. heavy equipment, bank loans and risky international markets to make it all work - have generated interest in the countryside and the cities are more diversified agriculture. Philippines: The Harvest Of Reforms

By Jonathan Power

ONDON — Barely bad President Corazon Aquino successfully held congressional elections in the Philippines than one of her most powerful cabinet members, James Ferrer, was killed. The shots could have come from the left or the right. but they pointed up the basic instability of a country where inequalities are great, the expectations of the poor are roused and the privileges of the well to do are valuerable. Mrs. Aquino's new land reform legislation crystallizes the problem: Promising on paper to strip the land, owning class of its accumulated holdings (including her family of its es-tates), in practice it is far from fulfillment. It tantalizes expectations and threatens privilege, yet does nothing to resolve the issue. The impoverished, in the foreseeable future, won't get the land they hunger for and the wealthy won't get the compensation that would enable them to invest in industrial enterprises.

In their new book, "Land Reform and Democratic Development," the two wise men of land reform Roy Prosterman and Jeffry Reidinger, identify three causes of revolutionary violence in Third World countries. The first is when expectations are un-changed but the acmaitry worsens. A good example would be Ethiopia in 1974, when poor rains caused the peasantry severe crop failures but the landlords tried to continue collecting a normal year's rent. This was the undong of the emperor, Haile Selassie.

The second cause is when the expectations and the actuality remain the same but the gap between classes and the level of opposition to authority that it generates can no longer be-managed by the government. This may come about either through a relative change in power or when the tools of authority, the military and the police, are crumbling. The collapse of the Russian Army in 1917. and the return home of the peasant; soldiers, weapons in hand, was a critical element in the revolution.

Third is the traditional cause: The revolution of rising expectations, which increase while actuality remains the same. This is the sit-uation in the Philippines.

In sum, it is not poverty alone somuch as it is blamable poverty that, seems to serve as the trigger of vialence. A large number of the most violent 20th century conflicts have occurred where a substantial part of the population was blocked from earning a secure living from the land it tilled. This was an important in gradient not just in the Russian revolution, but in the Mexican revolution, the Spanish civil war and the Irish struggte for independence." Since World War II, land protests have played a catalytic role in successful revolutions in China, Bolivia, Vietnam, Cuba, Algeria, Ethiopia and Zimbabwe, and it was of substantial significance in the toppling Kenya, Guatemala, El Salvador, Indonesia and, of course, the Philippines. Other reform programs have taken place without violence: in Japan, Egypt, Taiwan and South Ko: rea. (One of the most vigorous, that of Japan, was carried out by the U.S. occupation administration headed by General Douglas MacArthue

From Mrs. Aquino's perspective the reforms carried out in nearby Taiwan and South Korea should count the most. That in Taiwan, carried out by Chiang Kai-shek, made land owners of 60 percent of the former tenants. That in South Koses. carried out by Syngman Rhee, and well under way before the 1950 invasion by the north, made owners of 64 percent of the former tenants. Both countries credit their amazing economic success to the energies liberat ed by the major land reforms.

The Philippines is crying out fak-land reform. So are India, Pakissan Bangladesh and many parts of Latin America. If these countries can come to grips with this it could be done st minuscule cost compared with that of military repression. Moreover, these would be four major consequences.

1) avoiding civil conflicts that might involve millions of casualties, 2) avoiding 100 million or more deaths from hunger; 3) avoiding twice the number of births as now seems likely. as the essential conditions for volvi tary family planning are created and 4) avoiding a takeover by Markist egimes or reactionary despots.

Mrs. Aquino is at a critical turning. point. Part of her seems to know this, but it is still uncertain whether she has the political will or the vision in: do what she has promised.

Flying has become a first-class basale with delays, rude service, overbookings, understaffines and incidents that mind the contract of the contract service, overbookings, understaffings and incidents that raise alarms about safety. It isn't enough to point out that 1986 was one of the safest years ever, even if the volume of passengers served and millions of miles flown were records. Close calls, pilot errors, computer breakdowns and concerns about the adequacy of air controllers all have justifiably fed passenger anxiety.

haireds and burning resentments of the recent past, and politics is a nicer place Censorship in Saudi Arabia Regarding the two-part opinion column on the July 31 riots in Saudi Arabia (Aug. 11 and 12) by Mazher A. Hameed;

I have lived in Saudi Arabia for five years and can attest to the fierce regional tension between the Najdis, the Bedouin tribal families of Riyadh, and the Hija-zis, the merchant families of Jeddah.

It simply wouldn't do for Mr. Hameed to try to paper over this fact of Saudi history. Nor is it wise to minimize the discontent among the Shiites of the Eastern Province. I had students from that region come to class without the ghistra, the Sandi national headdress, to show their rebellion and contempt. As to the efficiency of the Saudi security forces, which numbers quite a few illiterates among its ranks, ask any expa-triate who lived there about their alleged efficiency and be will laugh at the idea. Mr. Hameed, an apologist for the Saudi regime, could not dare publish one world of criticism of any aspect of Saudi life in his homeland. And it is this total suppression of political and human freedoms that plays into the hands of Iranians. In the absence of democratic of "Hammer" (Books, June 9):

Autobiography is a subtle yet seemingly simple art form. What the reader has a right to expect is candor and inci-sive storytelling. It is also the most diffi-cult of literary labors in which to achieve unvarnished truth. I ought to know; I've read hundreds of them for my biographical researches. I even edited a book, "We Speak for Ourselves" (Doubleday, 1950), with more than 60 of the finest and most fulfilling chapters out of autobiographies. I am aware of the concealments, half-truths, blurred memories, distortions, rationalizations and ego peccadilloes inherent in the medium.

We have been fortunate of late in seeing first-rate autobiographies. Chuck Yeager's and Lee Iacocca's are among them — and so is "Hammer," Armand Hammer's newly published autobiogra-phy. Here is a testimonial to a life lived institutions. Rivadh will continue to be buffeted by the winds of change. Even will not, for long, protect a medieval system still living in the 7th century.

Mr. Hameed boasts of his country's effective handling of the news of the recent Mecca riot. It was the absolute success of absolute censorship. Coverage was confined to Saudi press reports and Saudi films of Iranian "provocations and of restrained security force reactions." Where was the free press? Its silence has not served us well; in the long run it will not serve Saudi Arabia and regional stability.

Foreign correspondents in Israel, who usually flock to dramatic stories, neelected Israeli Arabs who returned from fecca and told the Israeli press, including the English-language Jerusalem Post, that Saudi troops had opened fire on Iranians and that Saudi security men had clubbed to death Badr Za'arura, from a village near Nazareth. He was on a street on the way to a store. Fellow villagers buried him near Mecca.

Mr. Hameed's report that, unlike the 1979 crisis, this time the Shiite community of Saudi Arabia's Eastern Province didn't show the "slightest sign of identi-ty" with Iran, is fine. That's only his report. Mr. Hameed's article asserts there is Saudi stability in the face of the recent Mecca riot. Fine, It's time for the country to conduct an open inquiry into the riots. campus in the redwoods and a goodly helping of hippies for whom the year will always be 1969.

On a recent Sunday, at the Crown College campus of the University of California, a tennis camp for young-sters was just getting started. Nine, 10-and 11-year-old boys and girls, all of them beginners, were lined up in a dormitory courtyard and being sol-empty warned by counselors not to throw furniture out of the windows. On the sidelines, parents charted before the sidelines, parents chatted before getting into cars to head home.

In a large meadow overlooking Monterey Bay, children filled a row of tennis courts. They practiced their fore-hand and backhand while a gentle offshore breeze blew against their legs. The sun was warm but not hot.

Elsewhere on the campus, in front of Adlai E. Stevenson College, under a library with a bust of the Democratic presidential challenger, hundreds of high school girls stood in formations creaming their heads off in cheerleader camp. They were competing to see who had the most school spirit for the northern California regional United Spirit Association camp.

In town, on the beach in front of the Dream Inn (yes, that is its real name), young men and women in tuxedoes and long dresses played volleyball on the sand, waiting for a wedding to take place on the same sand. Farther down the beach, only a few yards from a large rock covered with legally protected sea lions, a flotilia of surfers paddled out to sea in wetspits, then rode the surf back to shore as far as they could.

At Mellis Market on Mission Street, the clerk told me that he had just about run out of charcoal. "It seems as if everybody in town is cooking on the grill tonight," he said with a smile.

As I looked at these scenes, because Santa Cruz has been my "other" home for 15 years, I had an eerie feeling. I watched the children and grownups at play, and heard about the journey of the tanker Bridgeton journey through the Strait of Hormuz, and then heard surmises about whether the Gas Prince would make it safely to port or be blown up and half of the United States Navy's Gulf squadron with it. I smelled the mesquite smoke from barbecue fires and heard about America's endless meddling without any

As I saw the sights and smells of a perfect Sunday afternoon, then heard the news from Washington, my eerie thought was that the scenes around me were like those of peaceful life in America before Pearl Harbor.

They were such lovely, heartwarming scenes - such fragile views of happiness in a cruel world - that they kept striking me as prewar scenes.

In a world as filled with such flammables as the Gas Prince, they were too precious, too gossamer to last. It also seemed that these images of peace were too precious to lose. Repeated millions of times in every city and hamlet across the United States this summer, they must not be allowed to be extinguished by scenes of war, without the most imperative reasons. And that makes me think of the people who run the country and what they should be considering.

Since these scenes of peace hang in the balance, does the United States really need to be sticking its nose into the Iran-Iraq war, which it already knows is being waged by madmen who do not mind dying?

Considering the value of boys and girls growing up and going to soccer camp without having to worry about whether their fathers or brothers will come home in a box or be buried at sea, do Americans really need to put that chip on their shoulder and see if Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini or Presiden Saddam Hussein wants to knock it off? Seeing as how oil has been flowing out of the Gulf for eight years of Iran-Iraq warfare without the United States sending in sailors or marines, why do people in America suddenly need to risk having terrified parents and distracted brothers and sisters?

I am sure there are high reasons of state for having the U.S. Navy on patrol in a zone where trouble is guaranteed. But are these reasons as valid, as heavy in the balance of human life as having a nation at peace — a nation with afternoons filled with such concerns as whether we or our neighbors are better barbecuers, and which team will cheer the loudest and who can ride the longest on a wave?

A nation at peace is so perfect and so tangible, its beauty so obvious, that such beauty should be risked only for an equally tangible necessity.

Is there anything so important about getting the blood of young American men into Gulf waters that it outweighs the banal images of peace on a Sunday afternoon? Maybe so, but you cannot see it from Santa Cruz.

Despite the cost of transporting and training new people, plans were drawn up for a largely transient population. But many of the original Bamovtsi stayed and are now clamoring for a "normal life." People came for a variety of rea-

"Some of the molecules we've studied don't work very well as models for the biological. perception of visible light. But they turn out to be excellent absorbers of another kind of electromagnetic radiation: radar."

Dr. Birge said a team of biophysicists familiar with such substances would need only about three years to develop a seence of radar-absorbing chemicals, each one designed to absorb a narrow range of radar wavelengths. The mixture of chemicals could be tuned to absorb a virtually continuous spectrum of radar wavelengths, thereby defeating any scanning system the Soviet Union might devise.

He said recent Soviet scientific papers imply that Russian chemists are already aware of the radar-absorbing potential of Schiff base salts. "Luckily," he said, "re-ports of our work did not identify the specific counter-ion or conditions we used in studying radar absorption."

Stealth technology does not depend on coatings alone. As defined by military de-signers, Stealth is a combination of qualities that permit an aircraft, missile, ship, ank or any other weapon to evade detection by any means — by sight or sound, by reflected radar and infrared signals, or by its own radio, radar and best emissions The main thrust of Stealth programs has simed at blinding enemy radar, and to that end, scientists have devised special aircraft shapes, structural materials and coatings.

The U.S. Air Force and such industries as the Northrop Corp., which is building the Stealth Advanced Technology Bomber. and Lockheed, which manufactures the F-19 Stealth fighter, have stressed the use of novel designs to thwart radar detection. Builders make Stealth aircraft as small as possible, and replace much of the metal. normally used in framework and skin with carbon-based composite materials. Carbon-based composites are not only light and strong, but tend to absorb radar even. without special coatings.

Cat Deaths Tied to Diet Deficiency

WASHINGTON (WP) - Researchers have discovered that tens of thousands of cats die each year in the United States because of an inadvertent shortage of a critical nutrient in cat food. "We were looking for relatively simple and taurine into their cat foods. As a result, most cat food is probably safe, molecules that could serve as laboratory models for studying vision." Dr. Birge said said Paul D. Dr. Pion and bis colleagues found that 21 cats fed on commercial cat food showed evidence of degeneration of the heart tissue. The finding will not only benefit cats, but will give researchers an opportunity to study the role of taurine in the human body. Not all cat foods were deficient in taurine, although most dry foods and most foods containing liver appeared linked to unarine deficiency in cats, Dr. Pion said.

New Date for Minoan Era's Demise?

WASHINGTON (WP) - Scientists may have a more precise data for the end of the Minoan civilization, which declined abruptly after a volcanic eruption apparently caused the evacuation of one of its chief islands about 3,500 years ago.

Much archaeological work has attempted to date the great eruption, which would enable scientists to place an end bracket on the Minoan period in the Mediterranean. So far they have been unable to place the date more accurately than within a 200-year period. A date of about 1500

B.C. has long been accepted.

But now the volcanologist C.U. Hammer of the University of Copenagen and his colleagues in Denmark have applied a different technique to the problem and say the accepted date may be off by about 150 years. If the new date can be verified, archaeologists will have to begin a scramble to revise the dating system of the whole Minoan period, expanding the "Late Minoan" era to before 1700 B.C. and cutting short the "Middle Minoan" period of massive building projects by more than a

Soviets Hope to Restore Horse Breed

MOSCOW (AP) — Zoologists have returned a rare horse to the desert where its ancestors once ran wild as part of an effort to restore the breed to Central Asia, the Tass news agency reported Wednesday.

The Przhevalsky's horse is a squat animal, usually about four feet

(about 1.5 moters) high, with a large head and small eyes. They were samed after the 19th-century Russian explorer, Nikolai M. Przhevalsky, who discovered them during an expedition to Central Asia.

There are fewer than 300 Przhevalsky horses around the world and all live in 2008, Tass said. The horses have not been seen in their natural habitat for more than 40 years. Tees said a stocky Przhevalsky colt born in captivity in the southern Ukraine was taken to a special animal nursery near Uzbekistan's capital of Tashkeni.

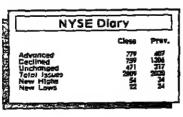

Ferris also objected to a color devised by the Air Force for the initial F-15 lighters delivered in the 1970s. The entire plane was painted a sky-blue color that Ferns believed would make the fighter dangerously conspicuous in battle. He made his point in a painting of the F-15 that is now part of the Air Force Art Collection, in which the fighter stands out starkly against a pale gray sky. Scon after Ferris presented his painting, the Air Force began coloring its F-15s gray Today's F-15s are painted in two "countershaded tones of gray, in

NYSE Recovers to Post Gain

NEW YORK — Prices on the New York Stock Exchange closed higher Wednesday in moderate trading, after a late blue-chip rally erased losses in that sector and also led the broader market into the plus column.

The Dow Jones industrial average closed 11.16 points higher at 2,665.82, according to preliminary figures, after falling 45.91 points on Tuesday. Advances just led declines, while volume totaled 181.82 million shares, down from 200 million on Tuesday.

Wednesday trading heartened some traders but discouraged others.

The absence of a sharp, dramatic self-off shows that "there may be a little too much complacency and that this pullback could be around for several weeks or more." said Eugene Perom Jr., director of technical analysis at Janes Montgomery Scott in Philadelphia. Mr. Peroni said the market bias could turn some and its behavior, tied more closely to economic and monetary events, could become more volational discounteration.

Michael Metz, portfolio strategist at Oppen-heimer & Co., said Wednesday's early self-off in moderate volume was negative.

"The more of a catharsis you get, the more you accommodate anxious sellers and get them out of the way," said Mr. Metz. But he said that Mr. Mets said the dollar's recent slide and the bond market's weak performance are the "obvi-ous negatives" that stocks now confront. "The question is whether the dollar continues its freefail." he said. "If it does, there are ominous implications for foreign demand for both bonds and stocks.

INTERNATIONAL MANAGER

For a Classic Case Study, Call on Lycurgus & Co.

By JOHN K. CLEMENS New York Times Service

EW YORK — Corporate resuscitation — the nearheroic art of bringing a company back from the dead—is no place for the faint-hearted. Salvaging a terminally ill organization often means making gut-wrenching decisions, performing radical surgery, and living with slim odds of success. It is the ultimate "bet your company, bet your job" roll of the dice for which consensual, good guy-managers need not apply. Darth Vader, the "Star Wars" heavy, is more the

No one demonstrates this better than the toughest turnaround manager of them all, Lycurgus: Remember him? It was during a Helot uprising (read that "labor unrest") that he was asked to rescue his organization, Sparta. He succeeded so well that Sparta not only recovered, but later beat the Athenians in the Peloponnesian War. Lycurgus' steeliness more than 3,500 years ago can serve as a model for 20th-cen-

As Sparta's ruler,

Lycurgus had a way of

1. Preparation. A successful turnaround is like painting a house. Preparation is everything.

First, Lycurgus got his friends to promise to cooperate; only then did he begin to lobby others. The result was a wide-ranging network of supporters who — unlike so many of today's fairweather corporate directors - would not jump ship at the first sign of trouble.

 Spartan "Boardsmanship." Lycurgus knew a congenial — and patient — board was critical to a successful annual. His was a hand-picked senate of elders made up of 28 people whose job it was to bring steadiness and safety to his organization. According to Plutarch. Lycurgus's biographer, they were "a central weight, like ballast in a ship, which would keep things in

3. Goodbye to the perks. Executive jets, fancy lunches, and stretch limousines may be fine when things are going well, but they are death to a successful turnaround. Savvy managers eradicate them just as Lycurgus did. He started by closing the board room. Worried that fancy digs would divert his advisers' attention, he had them meet outside instead, rain or shine.

OT BEING one for half-way measures, Lycurgus then shut the executive dining room, foreign his executives to forego elegant meals entirely or eat with the ordinary Spartans. He knew that "the rich [call them "executives"] being obliged to go to the same table with the poor [read that "employces"] could not make use of or enjoy their abundance, nor so much as please their vanity by looking at it or displaying it." Lycurgus was no less fanatical about three-martini lunches. He trained young Spartans to sobriety by making examples of slaves who were forced to drink vast quantities of alcohol.

4. Change the power structure. In Lycurgus's day, land equalled power. He changed his organization by changing its ownership. His land reforms, which put everybody on an equal footing, upset Sparta's fat cats, but got everyone else on his side.

5. Beware of international exposure. If you think international banking crises and whopping trade deficits are uniquely modern phenomena, guess again. They plagued Lycurgus, too. He simply got out of foreign trade. He did it by putting Sparta on an "iron standard." The result was a wonderfully weighty, and unwieldy. monetary system. Since there was no means of purchasing foreign goods, there was no international trade, credits, or debt.

6. Slim down the product line. Lycurgus knew the Spartans could not be all things to all people. He concentrated his people's

MicroGeneSys Ahead in AIDS Fight Connecticut Firm Takes Early Lead in Race for Vaccine

By Paul Richter

Los Angeles Times Service WASHINGTON - At a major AIDS research conference here last month, Franklin Volvovitz trailed around researchers and reporters trying in vain to interest them in a one-page press release about his tiny biophar-maceutical company, MicroGen-eSys.

"I tried to get us some attention, but I can't say I made much headway," said the 38-year-old founder, chairman and chief executive of the closely held com-

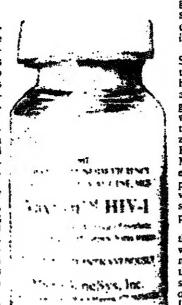

Mr. Volvovitz made a lot of headway Tuesday, however, when the U.S. Food and Drug Administration announced that MicroGeneSys, based in West come the first company to win the agency's clearance to test its experimental AIDS vaccine on humans.

While MicroGeneSys (pronounced "microgenesis") is still a long way from finding a way to prevent the disease, the 30-em-ployee company has taken an early lead over much larger competitors in a high-stakes scientif-

MicroGeneSys has more than a half-dozen competitors in the race to find an AIDS vaccine. They include the Oncogen unit of Bristol-Meyers Co.: Chiron Inc., which is collaborating with Ciba-Geigy; the Houston, Tex-as-based Institute of Immunological Disorders, in collaboration with George Washington University; Repligen Corp., with Merck & Co.; and others. Several may soon receive FDA approval to begin human clinical tests of their experimental vac-

Mr. Volvovitz does not have advanced degrees either in science or business. He organized MicroGeneSys in 1984 after the failure of his first biotechnology company, a six-employee con-cern called BioTechnologies that was set up to produce and market interferon, an antiviral agent, for laboratory and clinical use.

But the private investors who funded its operations changed their mind after less than two years. "They made the decision to close it down, and right away, hang, the assets were liquidated," Mr. Volvovitz says.

One of the reasons for MicroGeneSys's success is its willingness to share its proprietary products.

Soon he had the idea for a new operation that would concentrate on an obscure area of biotechnology, the development of vaccines from baculoviruses, a family of viruses found in in-

The company collaborates with about a dozen scientists from other research centers, including the Laboratory Center for Disease Control in Canada and Britain's National Institute for Medical Research. Micro-GeneSys is using the same basic Sys's prospects were helped by the strong support it seems to have won from its collaborators at the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases. which will carry out the initial tests of the vaccine. The organization's director, Dr. Anthony S. Fauci, appeared with officials of MicroGeneSys at a press conference Tuesday and said the company's genetically engineered vaccine "is an important first step" in the search for a way to "The company that develops the vaccine is going to have to win friends in the government medical establishment, because this is a very political matter," said James D. McCamant, editor of the Medical Technology Stock Letter in San Francisco. One of the reasons cited for MicroGeneSys's speed in develuping a vaccine is that it has been more willing to share its propri-etary products than other private companies have been.

MicroGeneSys's trial vaccine is made from a single protein from the outer cover of the AIDS virus and cannot cause the dis-

Mr. Volvovitz would not discuss how much money the com-pany has at its disposal. He said MicroGeneSys had accepted no venture capital, but had raised cash entirely from a small num-her of private investors.

Many biotechnology companies have had public stock offerings, or been acquired by larger corporations that could offer the financial resources needed to pay for lengthy drug-development efforts. Government researchers say they do not expect an AIDS vaccine to be ready for marketing until 1994. But Mr. Volvovitz would not disclose whether the company planned to go public or had other plans to gain financing. One broker has estimated that an AIDS vaccine might serve a $1 billion market, Mr. Volvovitz demurred: "Wall Street firms seems to like big, round numbers, but nobody's going to know for a long time how much money

UBS Ends Talks On Takeover Of Hill Samuel

By Warren Getler

LONDON - Union Bank of Switzerland said Wednesday that it had ended merger talks with Hill Samuel Group PLC, the British merchant-banking house. The news stunned London's financial markets, which had been expecting UBS to make a bid of as much as £738 million ($1.14 billion), or £8 a share. Hill Samuel's shares, which had been suspended at 763 pence for much of Tuesday pending an announcement, plunged as trading resumed, clos-ing Wednesday at 654 peace. Hill Samuel's stock price had climbed in recent weeks on specu-lation that UBS would make an offer. Analysts thought a bid for Hill Samuel was almost certain since the companies announced last month that they were holding Instead, UBS, the largest Swiss bank, said Wednesday that it was interested only in parts, and not the whole, of Hill Samuel, namely the group's merchant banking and its fund-management business. It said no acceptable basis for further talks had been found.

Sir Robert Clark, Hill Samuel's chairman, said: "It's a sad day for us. We're sorry that this fine oppor-tunity was not picked up. We're back to business and making moncy, and it should be pointed out that we were approached by UBS. not the other way around."
"I think that when UBS had finished assessing the proportion of business that they wanted to buy and that which they did not have an interest - mainly insurance broking and ship broking - they felt the latter category was large and thus decided not to get involved in a transaction requiring the disposal of a lot of assets," he said. Analysts in London surmised that the stockbrokerage Wood, Mackenzie & Co., which is part of the merchant-banking division, may have been the stumbling block. UBS already owns a leading British brokerage, Phillips & Drew.

The implication is that UBS did not want to pay for Wood, Mac-kenzie, which cannot be described ship without a rudder."

Mackenzie was not discussed as a problem by us or UBS." Executives of UBS said in Zurich that the bank would consider approaching other financial-service groups in London but for the moment would focus on expanding its existing operations there, which in addition to Phillips & Drew in-cludes UBS Securities Ltd. and a central UBS branch office. Last month Hill Samuel announced that it was engaged in talks with UBS and that it welcomed an approach that could lead to an offer for the whole company. The talks led to the resignation on July 9 of Christopher N. Castle-man, Hill Samuel's chief executive since 1980, who had pressed to keep the company independent.

"This must be a huge embarrass-ment for Hill Samuel," said a senior executive of a U.S. investment bank in London. "This is precisely why you don't announce merger talks until a bid agreement is completed. Not only did they lose Cast-

The ad is fictitious, but economists and stock market experts say the success of the Austrian government's plans to denationalize parts of its industrial holdings hinges on one burning question: Who wants them?

The coalition government hopes the answer is foreign investors, the market-makers on the Vienna Stock Exchange for the past three years. While domestic investors are more than welcome, Austrian stock experts have scant hopes that their countrymen will be significant buyers in the planned privatization, which should raise around 16 billion Austrian schillings ($1.23 billion) for the government. Austrians, it seems, are stock shy.

Only 1.5 percent of Austria's citizens own stocks of any kind, said Herbert Kaspar, chief economist at chischen Sparkassen AG in Vienna. "While we see that total rising in the future, it will be a gradual process," he added. "For the suc-

General Foods to Reduce Staff. Streamline 3 Product Sectors

New York Times Service

New York Times Service

NEW YORK — General Foods Corp., a part of Philip Morris Cos., said it would eliminate most of its corporate staff and create separate operating companies to run its three lines of business.

General Foods, whose brand names include Kool-Aid Maxwell House coffee, Jeli-O gelatin and Entenmann's baked goods, said Tuesday that the reorganization is intended to reduce layers of management so that its divisions can make faster and more flexible decisions. But analysts said the goal was to increase profits.

Analysts estimated that the company would save $150 million a year from the staff reductions. Under the reorganization plan, each of General Foods's three product sectors would become a separate operating company that would report directly to Philip Morris.

DOLLAR: Decline Is Tempered

(Continued from first finance page) Exchange blamed the dollar for the sharply lower close there, the fifth consecutive day of declines. The Hang Seng Index closed 54.23 points lower at 3,450.64 Wednesday, although volume was described as moderate.

In London, the Financial Times-Stock Exchange index of 100 leading shares fell 27.2 points to

In late trading in New York, stocks were only down slightly. The dollar's late recovery was also helped by comments from West Germany's finance minister, Gerhard Stoltenberg, who said that the present structure of exchange rates is apparently viewed as appropriate by the markets." Dealers said the remark reinforced fears of concerted intervention to stop a further dollar decline.

The spreading gloom over the dollar's prospects contrasts sharply with the market's ebullient mood shead of Friday's news that the U.S. trade deficit widened to $15.71 billion in June from a revised $14.04 billion in May. Dealers had been expecting a reduction to as low as $12 billion. Before the news, the dollar was hovering just below 1.90 DM and above 150 year.

Even so, traders said the steep slide appears to be leveling out. There may be a little more room to the downside, but not much," said Bill Doyle, vice-president at Fuji Bank Ltd. in New York. "This decline has been mostly a reaction to an over-bought market. The dollar climbed on the strength of higher oil prices, which really weren't justified from a supply-and-demand perspective."

U.S Eases Limits on Exports Of Computers to Soviet Bloc

NEW YORK - The Soviet Union and other East Europea nations will soon be able to import an unlimited number of no-frills personal computers from the United States and its allies, under a change in export control regulations, Reagan administration officials

The loosening of controls will mark the first time that the West has allowed ordinary personal computers, of the type commonly used in offices and homes for the last seven years, to be exported freely to the Soviet Union without export licenses.

The current generation of personal computers, officials said, including IBM's new PS-2 line, announced last April, and Apple Computer Inc.'s Macintosh computers, will still require licenses. The new guidelines are expected to be announced formally to the computer industry in early September, officials said.

er industry in early September, officials said.

In the language of the committee's regulations, the changes to go into effect in early September involve an adjustment in the threshold "processing data rate," a government-established measure of a computer's "throughput." Currently, any computer with a processing data rate over 2—a category that excludes most machines more powerful than a handheld calculator or video game machine—requires an export license. Now, licenses will be required for machines with a processing data rate in excess of 6.5.

"Privatization is really a political issue," said Georg Busch, an econ-omist at the Austrian Institute for Economic Research in Vienna. The conservatives say, 'Do away with state ownership altogether. Privatize everything Many Socialists see continued value in the state's taking a leadership role, which might help to better realize macroeconomic goals. The trend now is toward the first option."

Politics aside, there is broad consensus that something must be done about the state sector. Since 1980, losses have risen steadily. The privatization measures passed in uly also contained 32.9 billion shillings in aid for state-owned in-dustries, which had requested 42.9 billion.

Osterreichische Industrie Holding AG, the state industrial holding company that controls 200 compa-nies and about 96,000 workers, posted a loss of 10.2 billion schiligs in 1986, and expects losses of billion to 8 billion this year. BOOKS

YOU MUST REMEMBER THIS

By Joyce Carol Oates. 436 pages. $19.95. E. P. Dutton, 2 Park Avenue, New York. N. Y. 10016.

Reviewed by Michiko Kakutani

HE title of Joyce Carol Oates's 18th novel, T "You Must Remember This." comes, of course, from the song "As Time Goes By," but there are no love songs and little moonlight in this book; only lots of passion, jealousy and hate. Love, for the characters in this novel, is not about romance or redemption; rather it's a kind of obsession, a "blood-heavy extinction of their minds," which undermines their already precarious hold on reality and draws them closer and closer to madness and death.

As in much of Oates's previous fiction, acts of emotional and physical violence proliferate throughout the text. Grandfather Stevick walks out on his wife and children to take up with a showgirl, then blows his brains out in a hospital bed. His illegitimate son. Felix, will think about running head-on into an abutment on the expressway, his other son. Lyle, will contemplate hanging himself, and in the opening pages of the novel, Lyle's daughter Enid Maria will try to kill herself by taking an overdose of aspirin.

Though the sheer accumulation of these events has a certain numbing effect on the reader, there is nothing gratuitous or contrived about them. As experily dramatized by Oates, they not only underline the characters' fears about the randomness of life, but they also project a fierce vision of the United States during the 1950s — an America still reeling from the revelations of the death camps in World War II. an America rocked by the Rosenberg case, the McCarthy hearings and new anxieties about the Bomb, in fact, as the novel progresses, the characters' private hewilderment becomes a mirror of a larger, public sense of dislocation.

In this respect, certainly, "You Must Remember This" recalls Oates's highly acclaimed novel "Them" (1969), in which the disorders in her characters lives converge with the Detroit riots of 1967; and like that earlier novel. Remember is similarly grounded in a rich, Bal-Zackian matrix of social detail. Indeed with "Remember" and her last novel "Marya: A-Life." Ontes seems to have returned to the storytelling impulses that animated her first books; and in the wake of her uneven experiments with genre fiction ("Bellefleur." A. Bloodsmoor Romance" and "Mysteries of Winterthurn"), the result is a most felicitous one. Whereas such earlier novels as "With Shuddering Fall." "Them" and "Wonderland" held the author's penchants for the naturalistic and the Gothic in an uneasy balance, "Rement ber" welds them together to create a portrait of family life in the '50s that is both recognizable and horrifying, mundane and disturbing. While it cuts back and forth in time to show:

us three generations of the Stevick family, "You Must Remember This" is principal concerned with the youngest daughter, End Maria: Enid is a strange, watchful child stronge the model student and obedient daughter - and a cynical, sexually precocious mak-Perched on the brink of adolescence, she is initiated into the confusions and cruelties of the adult world by her uncle Felix, a former. boxer, who has taken his brash arrogance from: the ring and turned it on the world at large. Felix seduces Enid when she is 14, and as she grows increasingly obsessed with him; it becomes apparent that she is another one of those Oatesian victims whose passivity acts as a magnet for destruction. Though Felix is cold. manipulative and cruel. Enid is totally dependent on him and soon cannot conceive of hie without him.

Writing in powerful, meticulous prose, Oates conjures up for the reader the physical passion shared by Felix and Enid with the same brutalizing immediacy that she lavishes on the scenes of Felix boxing in the ring. We are made to see the dark, chaotic currents of guilt, anger and eroticism that run beneath the seemingly placid surface of the Stevicks' lowermiddle-class existence, and in doing so, we are also given a glumpse of the enormous game between appearance and reality that exists in-their lives: both the bourgeois hypocrisy that colors their acts and their futile efforts to reconcile their dreams of safety and their intimations of disaster.

Enid, whom we've seen engaged in the simple rites of girlhood (having her ears piercod. putting Noxema on a sunburn, copying hair-dos out of Screen World), will trade her youthful fantasies of romance for an ugly abortion and a weary cynicism. Her father will realize that all his efforts to protect his family, from: dispensing advice to building a bomb shelter in the backyard, can't prevent his loved ones from drifting away. Unable to cope with what has happened to them, these characters adopt the policy that "the wisest procedure is simply to forget" — something that the reader, mesmerized by Oster's masterly storytelling, cannot casily do.

Streaker Has No Place to Hide

By Thomas Boswell

Washington Pan Service
WASHINGTON — In one small compensatory sense, baseball is the easy game, the forgiving game. For whatever peace it gives, today can always be forgotten in the rush to reach tomorrow.

No matter how bad you are on Tuesday, you play again on Wednesday, you're always one game or even one swing from atonement. If instant absolution weren't built into its core, maybe the game would simply be too exasperating to endure. Even in the World Series you get to lose three times.

And baseball lets the individual hide within the team, at least for short stretches of time, until he can catch his breath. An error is overshadowed in the team's victory. A fine catch can conceal all the runners a pitcher leaves on base. Even a bad slump runners a pitcher leaves on base. Even a bad stump can, at times, coincide with team victories.

That's why a hitting streak is perhaps the most fragile and stressful phenomenon in team sports. For the only time in baseball, a player is stripped of both of his psychological shields — he is not allowed to have a single bad day (or even an unlucky one), and he is isolated from team protection. All alone one man against nine, he oursues a tion. All alone, one man against nine, he pursues a game within the game.

That's why Paul Molitor has come to fascinate us in recent days in a way that few players have since World War II. The designated hitter of the Milwankee Brewers has hit in 33 straight games more than a month without a collar. Because Joe DiMaggio's 56-game streak dwarfs other streaks so dramatically, it's easy to miss what Molitor has

His is the 12th-longest hitting streak since 1900. Molitor's binge is already longer than any streak in the 1950s or 1960s. In fact, since the Korean War, only Pete Rose, with hits in 44 consecutive games in 1978, has reached this high, lonely plateau where the whole sports world waits every day - to see if you've failed yet.

You can have a bad day or even a bad week and still bat 400 or hit 60 home runs. But a hitting streak can die, as DiMaggio's did, in a hail of line drives. That is why the streaker becomes such a romantic figure. Will be be stopped by a hot pitcher? A hot fielder? A bad umpire? Or by

A leadoff man like Molitor could do his job superbly — draw a couple of walks, steal a base, hit a sacrifice fly, give himself up to advance a runner — and still end up 0-for-1.

That would be all she wrote,

The night Rose was stopped in Atlanta, he hit two rockets — one at the third baseman, another into the glove of a pitcher who barely knew he'd caught a particle of history. It took a submarine change-up on a full-count pitch (a weird selection in a lopsided game) to confound Rose in his game-Because the streaker needs all the breaks and then some, one feels he needs our goodwill, too. When Molitor kept himself alive on Monday night. with a bunt hit, it seemed a nice omen. Rose kept it going in '78 with a bunt that Mike Schmidt couldn't or didn't field.

"I'm happy to get my hit early," Molitor said Monday. "As the game goes on, you find yourself

That is an understatement. Molitor has had few if any advantages during his streak. His team is not in a pennent race, so he can't wrap himself in a higher quest.
The hitters behind him are good but not learsome. The thought of Robin Yount, Glenn Braggs and Rob Deer coming up isn't making pitchers throw Molitor fastball after fastball.

As if a hitting streak weren't enough, Molitor also has another high stake on the line. If he can stay healthy for the rest of the season — and, remember, Molitor has been the most frequently disabled star of the 1980s (visits to the disabled list in '80, '81, '84, '85, '86 and '87) — he has a shot at

Perhaps more important, Molitor has already succeeded in drawing saturation coverage for the first time in his distinguished but frequently over-looked 10-year career. When you play in Milwaukee and break bones almost as often as other players break bats, you don't get much ink.

True, Molitor is the only player to have five hits in a World Series game. But that glory lasted one day and was forgotten the next week when the St. Louis Cardinals snatched the '82 Series from the

Now Molitor's tale of frustration, and his consistent excellence when he has been healthy, are far more widely known. When he's in one piece, Molitor approaches the level of George Brett. It's too bad that Molitor's reputation for hustling himself into the hospital has reached the point where the Brewers use him strictly at designated hitter to protect him from his own instincts. When you miss more than 400 games in 10 years, somebody's got to the you down.

Since returning from the disabled list on July 16,

Molitor has hit .406 (56-for-138), which is about normal for a long streak; DiMaggio hit 406 during his. But Molitor, who slashes doubles and triples. steals bases and hits best in the clutch, has also produced 55 runs and gotten on base 77 times in those 33 games. No wonder the Brewers, who were an eyelash shead of sixth-place Baltimore when Molitor returned to the lineup, are now within long-range sight of third-place New York.

His streak puts him in exalted company — the likes of Ty Cobb, Rogers Hornsby and George Sisler. Could be continue until his 31st birthday this Saturday? That would be 37 games, the sixth-

When Molitor is stopped, it will probably be far too easy for us to minimize what he's done because of that dastardly, unrealistic number - 56 - the record of records in U.S. sport.

To help us give him his due, perhaps we should remember one fact. DiMaggio only had one hitting streak as long as Molitor's in his entire career. Joe D just happened to keep going. For almost another

Now King breathlessly ("the king, the ruler — the trumpets should be blaring") introduced Tyson, who dragged himself from his plate. He wore a painter's cap with the name Taurus on it with the bill turned up, a T-shirt and black training pants — his businessman's suit.

"It's amazing how much disrespect I get since I won the championship," he said. "Everyone's tal-kin about how they're gonna beat me up." He suggested that was not good for those people's health.

A question came pertaining to Michael Spinks. How can this be an undisputed heavyweight title match when Spinks has yet to be beaten, "Spinks has no belt," said Tyson. "If he fights Tony Tucker and beats him, I'll have the fight."

Biggs had said Tyson was 5-8 he's actually listed at 5-1114. Still, won't a tall fighter like Biggs give him trouble? "I beat Green, I beat Ribalta, I beat Tucker, they were all about Biggs' size. Two World Swimming Records Set Compiled by Our Staff From Dispatches STRASBOURG, France - Two world records were broken within 45 minutes Wednesday at the European swimming championships.

West Germans Peter Sitt, Rainer Henkel, Thomas Fahrner and Michael Gross combined for 7 minutes, 13.10 seconds in the 800-meter freestyle relay, while East Germany clocked 7:14.27. Both times improved on the 7:15.69 turned in by the U.S. squad at the 1984 Olympic Games. Two races before, Tamas Darnyi of Hungary had retained his European title by lowering the world standard in the 400-meter individual medley. His 4:15.42 bettered the 4:16.12 registered by American Dave Wharton six days earlier in the Pan-Pacific Games in Brisbane, Australia.

Kenya's Benga Players Fight Western Pop

ien Terri Terris Service

AIROBI'S bars, thick with people, Neigarette smoke and rough-edged good times, rock to a staccato beat that achoes the traditional rhythms of Kenya's

It is the benga sound, vigorous African music sung in Swabili or vernacular. The songs reflect the musicians' world and spring from their customs and way of life. C.D.M. Kirata, in his song "Kaba Kuin-uka" — it means "I'd rather go home" in Swahili — deals with the difficulties of urban life. In "Micago Ya Azikuya" ("The Ways of the Kikuva", Joseph Kamuru explains the traditional customs of Kenya's argest ethnic group.

The music is popular among a wide cross section of Kenyans, in both rural and urban areas. Yet life for the Kenyan musicians who create these songs is decidedly oil key. Despite the popularity of their sound, they receive little promotion or financial backing. Most of them languish in

What is promoted is pop music from the United States and Europe, reflecting the influence of multipational recording companies and, to a lasser degree, the biases of radio disc jockeys who are members of the Westernized urban middle class.

The Voice of Kenva, the governmentowned broadcasting station, severely re-stricts the airing of local artists on the two major radio channels, the most powerful medium for the promotion of music in the East African nation of 20 million people. Kenyans and others who seek out the latest benga recordings find that record stores do not stock them.

"A nation needs its own art," said Jo-seph Odindo, a Kenyan art, critic "Nigenan Fela Kuti sings about juju (magic), South African Yvonne Chaka Chaka crooms about umkomboti [traditional beer] and Miriam Makeba sang about apartheid. The tragedy with the Kenyan situation is that musicians who use native languages. clearly inspired by the needs of the people around them, have been relegated to secand place, while records from outside the country are given tavish promotion by the

The pation's director of broadcasting not long ago issued a directive to his staff that vernacular music be confined to Kenya's regional radio stations, which transnot for an average of two hours a day to specific ethnic groups. The rationale used, one local music critic said, was that vernacplan maste reinforced ethnic feelings and thus promoted tribalism.

An earlier disagreement over the same issue led a group of Kenyan musicians to visit President Daniel arap Moi, who di- nyan musicians say they lack originality rected that local music be aired as much as possible to preserve Kenyan culture. Nonetheless, the situation failed to improve measurably, and some artists now are considering pooling their scant resources to buy air time to promote their songs.

Anna Mwale stole the show at a recent concert with

They argue that giving preference to Western music fattens the coffers of multinational record companies and drains the country of money that could be better spent on enhancing indigenous arts.

Odindo and others suggest that a recent concert in Nairobi brought into sharper focus the local musicians' struggle for rec-

Organizers of the event initially did not invite benga artists and some who were later asked to perform refused, feeling that their inclusion was an afterthought. Odindo said. The promoters attempted to sell the concert to the public largely with the names of pop stars from the United States, including Jermaine Jackson.

There was no mention initially of such African musicians as Luambo Luanzo Makiadi, the popular Zairian musician known as Franco. Yet the biggest crowd pleaser at the 10-hour concert was not Jackson, the only American artist to appear, but Anna Mwale, a Zambian singer.

Critics of the current generation of Keand that artists of earlier days were more enterprising and creative. As the popularity of the older artists faded, this argument goes, younger musicians unsuccessfully at-tempted to copy Western sounds to break into the music charts. The encounter between Kenyan and foreign cultures has produced, however, a kind of music that is mixture of local and Western. Bands in Kenya's coastal region, where performing at heavily frequented tourist hotels can be lucrative, have combined the traditional coastal rhythm, known as chakacha, with electronic equipment and Swahili or English lyrics. In the 1960s, a period when local musicians received greater promotion than they do now, several Kenyans became household names in east and central Africa. But today some of the former stars walk the streets unnoticed, working in a variety of low-paying jobs to get by.

Some go from one record store to snother with boxes of their recordings, hoping to persuade store owners to stock their music. impoverished musicians who are popular among local people have been dubbed "big name, no money."

Francis Njoroge, a musician who has been performing since 1974, has refused to take jobs outside his profession. His resolve has left him more out of work than employed, with his longest stretch of work covering only one year. He currently plays soft, samitized plane — he calls it billaby music -at a restaurant in an international botel in Nairobi. But he dreams of going abroad to record his personal mixture of traditional and pop music.

Njoroge said he conducted an experiment last year to determine the popularity of traditional music. He recorded a Kenyan folk song, backed by synthesizers and played it at a local discoth crowd responded enthusiastically and, in Njoroge's words, the music was no longer "my song but their song." But when he attempted to play it at another night spot, the club's manager "only wanted things that were imported. The people in the streets are out to listen to anything local. They will really get into your sound, but they don't get the chance to hear it on the radio. There is a real communications

"Local artists are viewed as substandard to Western artists. People in places like Britain and America have pride in their artists. But Kenyans don't believe in them-selves and believe that they can't create artists as big or as good as those from somewhere else. Our situation is similar to that of an impublished writer. You just keep struggling to have your work read."
